The mission of the Department of Political Science, at Rice University’s School of Social Sciences, is to contribute to the university and discipline through excellence in research, graduate training, and undergraduate teaching. We train graduate and undergraduate students in modern techniques of social science research in three substantive areas of political science—American Politics, Comparative Politics, and International Relations—to prepare them for successful careers in academia, government, business, law, education, non-governmental organizations, and many other professional paths.

Undergraduate students majoring in political science are encouraged to achieve both a broad understanding of the field and a specialized knowledge of one or more aspects of political science, including American Politics, Comparative Politics, and Politics and International Relations. Graduate study is grounded in the areas of American Politics, Comparative Politics, and International Relations.

It specifically studies the ways in which a single president can change the office and the government. The examination considers the expansion of presidential power especially during war and its relation to the Constitution. It assesses the public presidency through television, the internet and social media. It investigates the organization of the White House and the nature of presidential decision-making. The central question is how much of a difference do individual presidents make to the office they hold. |
